In existing telecommunication systems, a wireless service provider can provide a plurality of wireless technologies to multiple users. For example, a wireless service provider may provide multiple mobile wireless technologies to multiple users of differing wireless device types. In some instances, there are mobile technologies that are chosen and adopted by users based on a wireless technology that is less expensive or that has a less limited service area. Thus, if a wireless device user has a cellular phone with the technology of a first mobile operator, the user may choose not to use certain other mobile operator's services because of the higher costs for that other mobile operator. A service provider may offer third party services, for example a service provider may offer a service that provides indications of payment for use by the service provider or to a second mobile operator, in cases where the service provider provides a service to the second mobile operator. In some instances, the service provider may offer data processing services for users. For example, in a place that does not operate on one of the mobile technologies of the mobile operator, the service provider may offer data processing services for users to provide the data processing capabilities of the service provider for use by the user, to provide third party services, or to enable the user to make use of a service of the mobile operator. Depending on the wireless technology that is being used, the devices used by the wireless users, and the service provided by the wireless service provider, third party data processing services may or may not be necessary. The data processing capabilities that are part of some wireless technology may, for example, include programs and databases that are
